rear. If you're not in the middle of the ocean during a flight, or in the plane's "dry" cabin, you may not notice this rocket booster. But it's just one of the 50,000 pieces of hardware launched in this experimental plane, which the Chinese government developed in hopes of revolutionizing the way people fly and travel. After all, this drone/plane hybrid flies 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, and its batteries only need to be recharged every five years. This is something that's a big deal in a time when private airplanes are starting to gain greater acceptance in China, and new environmental laws are forcing many airlines to cut back their operations. The drone/plane hybrid, called the Sky Wing Technology, has yet to take to the skies, but it's still part of China's quest for the future of aviation. Yes, it's a bit weird to talk about a plane that flies overhead. It's also pretty cool, though, because not only is it close to what a trip in a jet airplane would be like, but it has the capability of taking off and landing vertically, and taking off and landing horizontally if need be. The Sky Wing was built in a factory in Sichuan Province and sent to a secret research center outside Beijing, where the team, which includes a squadron of engineers, engineers and artists, was working on the plane. To make sure it was safe to fly, the plane was tested in wind tunnels and using computer models. It was also tested in a 2.5-story-high building, and it's now set to be tested in the air, on May 24 in Shenzhen City in the southern part of China. According to a report from the People's Daily newspaper, the Sky Wing is not only a plane, but an airplane, and it uses modern technology. The plane has four linked robot arms that can be controlled remotely. It's designed to be able to perform long-range and cross-country flights,
