The idea of combining simulation and game data into one system has been used before, most famously in the FIFA Street series, and also heavily featured in some gameplay-focused modes of FIFA 19. But HyperMotion is the first major title to implement it. EA said it has also developed a custom-engine that allows players to customise the physical characteristics of the players. Players can apply custom physical attributes such as levels of power, acceleration and run speed. Hideo Kojima shared his thoughts about the evolution of football with Japanese newspaper Nikkei. In the near future, more fans of football will become interested in electronic sports, which could be based on the data we have created. These people will be the creators of football, and they will tell us what we should do next. Kojima was speaking after attending the FIFA 20 Japanese launch event in Tokyo. It was his first time attending the event, which featured football legends Lothar Matthäus and Cafu as well as current Japanese star Shinji Kagawa. FIFA 20 sold 2.5 million copies worldwide in its first week on sale. This is down almost 40 per cent on FIFA 19, which sold 3.5 million in its opening week. Kojima also told Nikkei that he was disappointed with the health and safety laws in the West. With FIFA 19, the health and safety of players were important to me. If you're shooting to make a hit game, health and safety are necessary, but with FIFA, the issue is not clear to me. He added that big developers such as Electronic Arts were "destroying the youth of the sport". "It's a virtual world, but we need to see the real world, too." Kojima's comments follow those of the likes of Cristiano Ronaldo and David Beckham, who were critical of the FIFA 19 ratings system. In the West, we don't have enough footballers. That's because there are many players who are not accepted as real football players, so we have to make fake people. I want to make a hit game, but our models are low quality. Why are they low quality? That's because the industry is ruled by artificial intelligence. I know that the quality is low, but I'm not 100% sure about the specific reasons
