An important problem in robotics is for robots to localize themselves in their environment. A good example is a mobile robot that has to navigate from the start in an unknown environment. The target is to have this robot find its way, using visual information, from a start-point to a destination. In this paper we describe a visual sensor for autonomous navigation using a mobile robot. This sensor relies on the mobile robot being equipped with multiple marker-cameras. Each camera observes a small region of the overall environment. By triangulation a three-dimensional image of the environment is built up. During sensor development we refined our algorithms and performed preliminary experiments with real-world data. The new and improved version of our sensor was tested with a mobile robot in a simulation environment, as well as in real-world conditions, in an industrial environment with soft robots, and a warehouse with no-line-of-sight. We compared the performance of our sensor with two other sensors, which were later developed at the Delft University of Technology: the SAS² sensor and the UW³ sensor. The results show that the new sensor is at least as good as the other two sensors. In one of the tests, we also tested the sensors with our proposed visualization technique: a virtual reality display.

Sensor	Localization error	Localization time
SAS	7.5	1.8
UW	4.3	1.2
OTV	4.7	1.2
OTV	with visualization	1.1
