paper? 2008, WMO-9, WMA,.Cannabinoid actions in mood and anxiety disorders. Cannabis usage is increasing due to its perceived therapeutic benefits for a range of symptoms such as the anxiety and depression associated with mood and anxiety disorders. In many countries, physician advice is being sought for cannabis usage, with traditional medical advice regarding the risk of cannabis use being poorly communicated. This review explores recent evidence regarding the role of cannabis, cannabinoids, and receptors (CB1 and CB2) in the pathophysiology of mood and anxiety disorders.

These data illustrate that CB1 and CB2 ligands possess therapeutic potential for mood and anxiety disorders. This evidence also implicates the potential for CB1 and CB2 agonists to be used in the treatment of these disorders as a adjunct to conventional therapies. This review also examines data on the role of the endocannabinoid system in endogenous mood and anxiety regulation and discusses potential molecular pathways that could be targeted therapeutically in mood and anxiety disorders. Dietary dodecyl 2-(2-ethylhexyl)glucoside prevents hepatocellular steatosis by regulating lipid
