What's new in Solitaire Beach Season:

U. This blog is about the lessons I've learned during the 2+ years I've been doing this. Some lessons are sharp, others are blunt. But it's all part of the on-the-job learning so I'd rather attempt to forget the ones that are sharp and share the ones I found dull or that are a good reminder. Monday, September 7, 2012 "Oh, you're too honest!!" You're reading, "Oh, you're too honest!!" with me, have you? Yes, I know. I know. I know. Fair game. I just finished an app I'm doing for a plumbing contractor. It's NOT a website; it's just an app. I haven't decided if I'm going to charge for it but if I do, I'd have to figure out a different user name. Ah! Bueno! I said he'd been around 5-7 years. That's because I used the only person I'm familiar with as an example, meant to be a middle-aged husband and father with a family. Yeah, there I go again! But - you know, stick with me - what I didn't say was that the family would be mostly grown up and not pregnant. Several of my examples were about middle-aged fathers. Because, well, it's a dadge! I like getting 'real' examples because I don't always have to think of someone like me, although I once gave a talk to very advanced plumbing students (nursing school graduates) about what I would do if I got contractions while on a job. I told them to just call someone else. They seemed like they were okay with that which was a good thing. In building cases, I tell the client what needs to be rebuilt so they get the style I'm going for. I explain why I want the way I'm thinking of doing it because my experience says it's a good idea. I talk about the projects I've done before, some are quite handily in reference books. But I don't always remember to tell that to the client. I do get a dialog going; I explain my logic, I build a picture in their minds. Sometimes, I think they understand. But then when I get to the end, they seem to be thinking, "Whaaa? You said it was going to be this?" But I've never felt like I was trying to sell them something. But
