And, since many people are at their most engaged when the economy is slow, you know that businesses are in # trouble. Add to this mix the fact that people with jobs are engaging in work-from-home, and you have kids who are absent from school. Suddenly, charter schools, online schools and not-so-good public schools are earning their keep. This is not an issue just of the past. In fact, our experience with these issues is quite contemporary. Sally O'Neill has been teaching young children in low-income neighborhoods in Chicago for some time now. She has noticed that kids in these neighborhoods love to read, and that parents are eager for their children to become book lovers. As she writes, "Our children's lack of access to books outside the home, and their extensive experience reading only the words on the page, is one of the most striking differences between children and teens in large cities and children and teens in tiny towns and rural areas." Pushed further, she writes, "Reading a book is a form of play, and without play, children cannot learn." As she has watched these young children at play, she has noted that they inhabit a world of their own. They make and break box trucks, and there is often a jolly, almost anarchic mood to their games. I'm not as familiar with NAT as I should be. I came from a different field (biology) and because of that I'm not as sure about NAT but I can say that NAT does provide a kind of security. I imagine it would work like this. The ISP provides an IP address range that does not have public IP address. I have a firewall at my computer. I connect to the ISP via a VPN. Does NAT prevent attacks from coming from external sources? There is a better way of explaining this than what I said? A: When a firewall is in place, it is like a big "gatekeeper". Let's take this from a slightly simpler example. A company may rent a property, and say that all traffic entering from the public streets has to go through the security check. However, since there are no public exits (because the property is hidden from the public view), there is no way to see what is going on, beyond the already monitored entrance. The business gets to know what is being done because there are security cameras monitoring the property, or because someone peeking through the window notices something. A NAT firewall does the same thing, except the exit point for traffic is not through the firewall, it is through the NAT. A good NAT firewall will 0cc13bf012
