Calf block The calf block is a piece of literature that frequently appears at the beginning of contemporary novels by authors in the United Kingdom. It is used to introduce the narrative to the reader, so the first 50 pages of a novel are known as the 'calf block'. Like the other blocks that appear at the beginning of a novel, the calf block was originally used to set the scene. The first calf block of a novel would begin at a point where the novelist and their characters were at an important point in their life and change to reflect that change. One of the first books to have a calf block is Tess of the D'Urbervilles by Thomas Hardy. The term 'calf block' originated in the late 19th century, and refers to the way a calf was blocked out or traced on to canvas to show the outline of a calf. The first calf blocks that appeared in fiction were shaped like a calf. The blocks that make up the 50 pages that make up the calf block were originally shaped like these, so they were called 'calf blocks'. They are now written on a rectangular grid, and take whatever form the novelist chooses. The terms 'anal' and '
