body of a man who washed up along the shore at Middleton Beach earlier this week has been identified as an Ohio man who had been missing for four years, officials said Friday. Chief Patrol Officer Thomas Nicholson of the Massachusetts State Police said the man's identity was confirmed by a DNA match with family members in Ohio. Nicholson said the man, who has not been named, was found by a dog walking area at about 5:20 p.m. on Wednesday. He was wearing an orange shirt and blue pants. Nicholson said that "everybody is relieved that it's him, but we're still looking for his family and friends." Officials from the FBI, U.S. Border Patrol, the State Police and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration were assisting in the search for the family members. The police department was not releasing any additional details. Middleton resident Steve Martin said he was aware of the case and had heard that the man's family was having a difficult time reconciling what happened to him. "He was an older man and was wearing a florescent orange shirt," Martin said Friday. "He was definitely not from the area." Martin said he would be happy to show police the fishing area where the man

Macrolide antibiotics, due to their potent immunosuppressive and anti-proliferative activities, are widely prescribed for respiratory tract infections, particularly for those affecting the elderly, infants and children. However, repeated treatment with macrolides is often associated with an increasing incidence of resistance among the bacterial strains responsible for respiratory tract infections. This review focuses on the solution for this problem, focusing on several macrolide resistance mechanisms. A new macrolide, telithromycin, a ketolide, is more potent than erythromycin and clarithromycin, and more stable to inactivation by gastric acid. It has also recently been shown to exhibit good penetration into the central nervous system, which may have relevance in the treatment of central nervous system infections. Telithromycin, at a dose of 800 mg daily, is as effective as clarithromycin, 500 mg twice daily, in the treatment of respiratory tract infections. Telithromycin has also been shown to be as safe as clarithromycin for chronic use. Finally, information on the pharmacokinetics and dosing schedules of both agents are provided.Tottenham goal keeper Gomes remembers the 2018 FA Cup final against Chelsea. The Portuguese goalkeeper made a key save that denied Chelsea a goal after half-time in the 2018 FA Cup final at Wembley. Spurs went on to lose the match 2-1. On Sunday, Maurizio Sarri's side beat Brighton and Hove Albion 2-0 to complete a comfortable passage to the FA Cup Final.
