The transmission of electromagnetic signals is a key part of modem information processing. The primary types of electrical devices that are used to transmit and receive such signals are semiconductor devices fabricated with either gallium arsenide (GaAs) or silicon (Si) materials. Devices such as field effect transistors (FET) fabricated in Si technology, for example, can be much faster than equivalent GaAs devices, but generally require a complex interconnection system to interface them to other circuits. On the other hand, FETs fabricated in GaAs technology are inexpensive to manufacture and can be extremely fast. A significant advantage is that such devices may be fabricated with a single layer of epitaxial material. Therefore, the fabrication of GaAs-based FETs has traditionally been more compatible with batch processing, thereby making it suitable for the construction of circuits requiring thousands or even millions of devices. Unfortunately, GaAs-based devices do not lend themselves to direct integration with silicon CMOS technology. A method to fabricate GaAs-based FETs that are directly integrated with CMOS circuits on a single chip is disclosed in a paper by J. Varadan et al., entitled "A Compatible Planar GaAs/Si/SiO<sub>2</sub> Technology for High Speed Integrated Digital Circuits", published in the IEEE Journal of Solid-State Circuits, Vol. 23, No. 5, September 1988. The basic elements in such an integrated circuit structure are a Si/SiO<sub>2</sub> substrate, an n+/n-type GaAs substrate, n+/n-type and p-type GaAs epitaxial layers, and an insulating layer of SiO
